In the construction of fluid-filled automotive shock-absorbers, it is conventional practice to assemble a plurality of individual fluid-filled cells into a stack, and to bond the stack to a hub plate. In one prior art technique for assembling cell stacks into a unitary package, an individual cell is supported on a shim, typically of the type shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,463,468, and a tube having a flange is extended through the open-ended top of the shim, around the periphery of the cell, and downwardly around the shim to an opposite flange of the tube. An end of the tube has an external diameter which is somewhat greater than the inside diameter of the cell. Pressure is applied to the inside of the cell to deform the cell into engagement with the external periphery of the tube and to radially expand the tube in the process. The tubes are then bonded to the top and bottom flanges, and the entire assembly is bonded to a central hub plate. The foregoing method requires that the cell be positioned on a shim having a supporting lower wall of a configuration suitable for engaging the open-ended top of a cell, and of a thickness sufficient to prevent the top wall of the cell from collapsing inwardly into contact with the lower wall of the shim. Moreover, the cell must have a diameter which is so large that the flanged tube can pass therethrough without radial deformation. A less complex cell structure is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,875,624 to Cullum,
